Marna's 2 Cents

I have a love/hate relationship with cars.

I love driving and will go almost anywhere on any road, at varying degrees of law abidingness. But I hate taking care of cars. I am a firm believer that when Mother Nature deems it necessary to wash my car, it will rain. Drowning out a clunky noise by turning up the radio is a suitable resolution. And the 5000 km oil change thing is merely a suggestion. I do succumb to taking care of my car's basic needs, however I won't repair that which is not absolutely vital. So it's a yes to replacing the windshield wiper on the driver's side after having it fly off on the highway, and I will react with cat-like swiftness should the tushy warmers fail. But it's a no to fixing my car lighter.

These are the quirks that make me who I am, and I'm happy to live with them. Most of the time. Sometimes it comes back to bite me a little, like the other day when I was helping process an order for the very popular CU8703 USB Car Charger. That's a reason for a working car lighter if ever there was one.

Because I cannot avail myself of the usefulness of car chargers and I have an antiquated, circa turn of the century smart phone – ergo limited battery power – the CU8703 Portable Battery Charger and I have become close friends.

This small battery back-up system is ideal. By some miracle of science it holds precisely the charge I need, and it dispenses that thoughtfully with an LED charge status indicator. I can charge it by day as I work away on my computer, ready to be snatched up and taken along on my latest road trip. It's become my trusty companion, ever stalwart and unblinking in the face of every clunky noise emanating from the engine compartment.

Now, if I could only get it to take my car to the service station, every once in a while...

Until next time, this has been my 2 cents!
